More specifically, the invention relates to surgical devices for performing corneal and other types of refractive surgery that can be used without using a microscope, and that do not require the use of surgical sutures or corneal incisions. It is known that eye disorders such as nearsightedness and farsightedness can be corrected to a certain degree by performing laser surgery upon the external surface of the cornea. The procedure is performed from the front of the patient's eye (typically from a slit lamp) using a surgical device having a laser, which is controllable so as to selectively remove layers of the cornea to a desired depth, creating a new curvature to the cornea. A technique for performing such laser surgery is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,665,913 to L'Esperance et al., the disclosure of which is hereby incorporated by reference. L'Esperance et al. discloses a technique in which a laser beam is caused to irradiate a desired location on the cornea, and in which the laser is caused to move vertically in steps such that the laser irradiates the cornea at different depths along its vertical cross-section. The laser beam preferably is moved vertically in steps of about 1.0 millimeter, such as in steps of about 0.2 millimeter. The technique of L'Esperance et al. does not require the use of a microscope, but rather relies upon the use of a laser beam, which is typically passed through a microscope. While techniques such as that described by L'Esperance et al. are currently widely practiced, they suffer from a number of disadvantages. For example, the use of a surgical laser requires
